Facilitating Healthy Pastor-Congregation Relations

One Session Remains for 2022:

Tuesday, October 11
8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

This workshop will be conducted online via Zoom, and will be presented by the Lombard Mennonite Peace Center.

About the Workshop:

The church is experiencing something of a crisis in the pastorate system. Clergy morale is low, with pastors under attack as never before. An increasing number of involuntary pastoral terminations leave a lasting legacy of pain in many congregations. Facilitating Healthy Pastor-Congregation Relations is a workshop intended to help congregations address these problems.

The workshop is based on the Lombard Mennonite Peace Center's experience over a number of years in serving as a mediator and consultant to severely conflicted churches from a broad range of denominations. An emphasis in working with these churches has been to help them establish more healthy conflict norms. The workshop suggests some of the structural changes that we have found can help a church function in more healthy ways.

However, structural changes are not enough; attention must also be given to emotional processes and the ways that leaders function. Thus, the workshop also reflects our training in family systems theory and how it relates to church conflict. Family systems theory provides important insights into how leaders can function in well-differentiated ways so that the potential destructiveness of conflict can be minimized.

This workshop will help you . . .

- Understand some basic concepts of family systems theory and apply them to congregational life.
- Manage pastoral transitions more effectively.
- Improve support systems for pastors.
- Institutionalize healthy conflict procedures.
- Understand "leadership through self-differentiation."
- Refocus on your congregation's mission and purpose rather than having energy being drained by contentious issues.
